Q: Why does it seem that copies of my source code lose their debugging information? I am the only one who uses my local machine and after being working on a local version of a system for a long time and editing the source code I now open it on my own machine and find that the local version has lost all debugging information. It's like the source code became cut off from the debugger. Why is this happening? I use eclipse as the IDE. A: In my case I was working on the Debug view while the Build view was empty. Then when I was done editing the source I forgot to build the project. Now when I open the project on my own machine I see that nothing has changed, though I assume that I would see a difference since I'm the only one using the project and haven't built it in a while. The solution to my problem is to build the project and then open it, it will show the difference and the changes made while debugging. It's a trap. You see one of those waiting room posters on the wall: "LOOK BEFORE YOU LEAVE!" In one hand the salesperson beckons you in, with the other he beckons you to take a seat. He knows you'll be here for a while, so he tries to sell you stuff. He's smiling. He's all friendly. But his intent is clear: he's trying to manipulate you into making a purchase. The unconscious tendency to react to someone who's smiling and friendly can also be used to sell or manipulate someone. The salesperson's smile is a trap. It's not a trap when you're the buyer. You can use that technique on your salesperson. The salesperson's smile is a trap when you're the seller. You'll have to tell him to stop it. We are genetically programmed to react to people who are smiling and friendly. When you want to get someone to do something, you smile and show friendly interest. Your mind is primed to see it as a manipulative thing 4bc0debe42
